We have explored the structures of the buried and exposed regions of human serum albumin (HSA) upon binding with indomethacin (IMC) by a high-resolution X-ray crystallography approach. This is the first study to provide crystal structure information for the buried IMC-binding site in HSA and unveil the structural changes at the buried IMC-binding region as well as to provide the interface regions (IMC binding sites) of HSA that can modulate protein-drug interactions. The IMC binding appears to perturb the accessible region, resulting in a subtle conformational change in the neighboring loop, while the unperturbed structure of the buried region (IMC binding site) is retained. Furthermore, the overall protein conformation is maintained
